June 5, 2017 1:05 pm ET Order Reprints Bloomberg News Printed Article A vote of confidence from Credit Suisse is boosting eBay shares on Monday. We share that trust and expect the auctioneer's shares online to continue to rise. Analyst Paul Bieber took over eBay coverage (ticker: EBAY) and increased its rating from Neutral to Outperform, with a price tag of $44.44. While eBay remains a turnaround story, Marketplace's growth is stable and has the potential to accelerate in the second half of 2017/2018, driven by platform changes and product innovation, Beiber writes. Stubhub's growth is attractive, and the Classifieds business is underestimated by Street, given a comparable European direct sales price with a healthy multiple. The shares are 0.6% higher to $35.55 in recent trading, but seem very affordable in contrast to many high-tech stocks. It's certain that eBay's first-quarter earnings, announced in April, hardly thrilled analysts. But Beiber argues that eBay has several levers to pull to drive growth: He estimates that monetization of its classified business and/or Stubhub could be worth $9.5 billion to $12.8 billion (about 25%-35% of the company's current value), thanks to attractive multiple-comparable sales. He also thinks structured data, new product experiences and more marketing investment can increase the gross volume of goods in the company's core marketplace business. And promoted ad lists, which are replacing third-party ads that previously took consumers to a different site, should increase transaction revenue growth. Barron argued late last year that a new and improved website could help eBay put past mistakes behind it and help it regain momentum. The stock has risen nearly 13% since then, roughly in line with the broader market, but eBay could soon outperform thanks to technical improvement, new marketing strategies and growth and robust cash flow fueling its turnaround. (Even tech-skeptical portfolio managers have eBay in their portfolios.) eBay has a lot of money to keep rebuying stocks, and could spin its growing companies Stubhub or Classifieds, as it did PayPal (PYPL). eBay shares trade for just over 16 times future earnings. This is quite cheap compared to other tech darlings like Amazon (AMZN), Google (GOOGL) and Facebook (FB). While eBay doesn't have the enviable growth trajectory these companies have, analysts are still projecting earnings per share to rise nearly 20% year-on-year next year, and maintain a similar long-term pace. eBay is a rare value story with multiple paths to value creation, as Beiber writes. Given its growth potential and secular tailwinds, he argues that eBay should negotiate with a premium for comps. Currently, eBay trades with a free cash flow yield of 6%, which also provides compelling valuation support. And eBay could buy Etsy (ETSY) to boost growth. In short, eBay has made remarkable progress in its turnaround, as its earnings of 19% in the year to demonstrate that it is not too late to buy the shares at a reasonable price. Comments?
